Energy's circle

Energy can neither be created nor destroyed, according to the first law of thermodynamics. If energy can't be destroyed, you might ask, how can there be an energy crisis? How can we be running out of it?

Let's start at the beginning. What is energy? The ability to do work. What is work? The transfer of energy from one body to another.

To put this circular definition into practical terms, energy is what we use to manipulate the world around us, whether by exerting our muscles, by using electricity or by using mechanical devices such as automobiles.

Energy comes in a variety of shapes and sizes, such as a lump of coal, a battery, a piece of uranium, heat or light. In order to better understand energy and the variety of forms that it comes in, we can classify it into some broad categories.

The first two very broad classifications are kinetic and potential energy. Kinetic energy is energy in motion. A moving car, water flowing over a dam and light coming to us from the sun all have kinetic energy.

Potential energy is the stored energy in such things as the water behind a dam, a lump of coal or a gallon of oil.

To understand energy and our energy crisis, you must understand these two forms and what happens when energy is converted from one form to another.

The second law can be translated to say "there is no free lunch," meaning that there can be no perpetual motion machine. The amount of energy put into a system is always greater than the amount of energy we get out of it. One conversion system can be more or less efficient than another, losing more or less energy, but no system can be 100 percent efficient.

No matter how efficiently we use energy, we still lose some of it as heat every time we convert it from one form to another. But, right now, and for billions of years, we don't have to worry about the universe running out of energy. Our concern is having energy available in a usable form during the next few years and decades.

There are five primary sources of energy available to us on earth, as follows: solar, geothermal, chemical, tidal and nuclear. Three of these--solar, geothermal, chemical, tidal and nuclear. Three of these--solar, geothermal and tidal--are in kinetic form; the other two--chemical and nuclear--are potential (stored) forms of energy.

We classify the fossil fuels such as coal, oil and natural gas as chemical energy because it is a chemical process that converts these potential energy sources to usable forms. When the carbon atom contained in these fossil fuels is burned, the energy stored within them is released.

These fossil fuels today provide this country and the world with almost all of the energy they use.
